Interdisciplinary research project: “Exploring multiple dimensions of international criminal justice acceptance in the after-Nuremberg era.”

The International Nuremberg Principles Academy is conducting an interdisciplinary research project in relation to the acceptance of international criminal justice. This project aims at developing comprehensive research tools in order to assess and compare the level of acceptance in different situation countries and also to analyze dimensions and factors influencing the acceptance of the international criminal justice institutions and their outcomes.

During 2015 the project research team will develop a sound and scientific methodology, map the relevant existing studies and invite experienced academics and practitioners to discuss methodological and other issues to be addressed and assessed in relation to acceptance or the non-acceptance of international courts.

For that purpose the Nuremberg Academy will commission in-depth analyses of the acceptance situation in particular countries and in relation to the investigation and/ or adjudication of particular situations from international courts. In addition, the International Academy will support universities and research institutions in situation countries to engage with professionals and practitioners in the field of peace and justice research, share knowledge and strengthen their capacities in interdisciplinary research.
